Central Processing Region – Indianapolis, IN Regional Processing and Distribution Center (RPDC) Delays

The U.S. Postal Service is making adjustments to its processing equipment and operational flows in the Indianapolis, IN Regional Processing and Distribution Center (RPDC). While we finalize these improvements over the next two to three weeks, customers may experience temporary delivery delays.

We are currently installing new package sorting machines for large, oversized volumes that were historically processed manually. Routing changes are also occurring to improve operational flows and cycle times into and out of the region. Hiring is progressing to add more team members to support these changes. Management support will be on site over the next few weeks as these changes take effect.

These updates are critical to ensuring our network is fully prepared for the upcoming peak season.

Thank you for your patience as we work to build a faster, more efficient postal network.
